3. COURSE CONTENT

The course delves into the study of gender as one of the central analytical categories in social sciences and research. It is designed for third- and fourth-year students with a particular interest in gender studies, who have previously attended the introductory course FYRK293 "Sociology of Gender."

The course provides a concise mapping of social research on gender, highlighting key milestones in its development both internationally and in Greece. It examines fundamental methodological approaches, such as standpoint epistemology and intersectionality, and their application in specific research fields. Subsequently, through the study of academic articles and examples, the course focuses on specific areas of research that have been central to the sociology of gender.
